I am trying to keep up with it by writing shorter posts & faster. By some measure this goes against what you want to see.
These posts will be short bursts of my own interests that you can choose not to read. I apologize for this because while I have written at the length I intended and wanted, writing shorter posts will allow me to share what I have learned & collected in one post instead of trying to fit it all into one longer post or force readers to skip. Can't forget that this is a blog & I like to write the type of reader who likes the posts to be informative.

Blaauw studied vegetation along roads outside the city of Cape Town. He found that the vegetation along roadsides was similar to that in fields at higher altitudes, pointing to a "jungle effect". Some sites from his study have been renamed Blaauw's Bushveld, a name that describes the vegetation along roadsides.

It seems to have its principal action beginning in pregnancy, and increasing during lactation, although it may continue to increase during the postpartum period. The pregnant woman, therefore, is more liable to infections than the non-pregnant woman.
